Market commentary

For all the headlines and worries about war, inflation and interest rates, March delivered a surprising result for most risk-based assets. Global equities returned +3.1% in local terms.

This performance is despite the US Federal Reserve increasing interest rates for the first time since the pandemic and signalling a more aggressive stance on future rate hikes. Other central banks indicated they will soon follow. These actions led to, according to Bank of America, the March quarterly performance of 10yr US Treasuries being the worst in around four decades.

Despite the common rhetoric that this moment is the equivalent of “taking away the punch bowl” for share prices, US assets (equities and REITs) posted solid performance, almost from the point where interest rates increased. None of this should be a surprise to our regular readers of Investment Perspectives.

The Australian market continued its stellar run, driven by the strong commodity cycle, posting a +6.7% return. The outperformance against other markets is coming from the benefit of avoiding the currency headwind.

Portfolio commentary

In keeping with the “risk-on” environment, the strategy delivered a +4.0% total return.

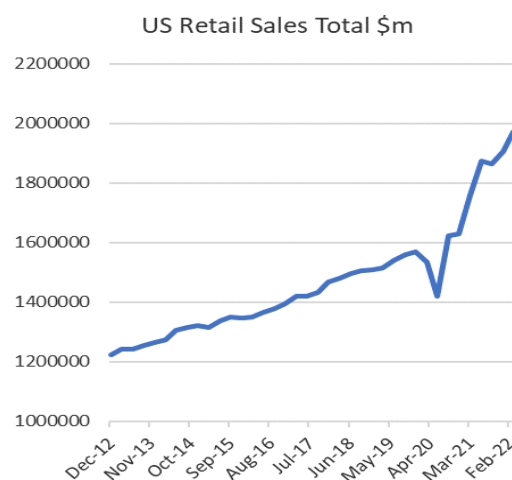

Our exposure to senior housing again paid off in the month, with both Ventas and Welltower contributing the largest returns. Betting on the ageing demographic is one macro-theme we can understand – and the share market continues to help us by inexplicably pricing these companies cheaply.

None of our laggards this month are a cause of concern. LEG Immobilien (German housing) posted excellent operating performance for the quarter, however in the short-term the market is pricing the company as a bond proxy which is not great in the current environment. Ultimately, the company’s solid earnings and dividend growth (dividends expected to increase ~10% this year) will matter more. As highlighted by the following chart, LEG’s historic and expected earnings look nothing like a bond coupon.

Another drag on our performance, Simon Property (US Retail) gave what we believe to be very conservative 2022 guidance, which based on recent US retail sales data (combined January-February sales up +15.6% on 2021), leaves plenty of room for earnings upgrades in the months ahead.

During the month, we started to travel again and braved a real estate conference in Florida (United States). The overwhelming sentiment across most sectors was sustained landlord pricing power – driven by delayed supply, and very strong underlying tenant demand. There were exceptions (coastal office) however, it is clear the real estate industry is benefiting from rising construction costs crimping the feasibility of delivering marginal supply.

It is for this reason that real estate tends to be a very good hedge against inflation over the medium and long-term. In this month’s investment perspectives, we test real estate performance in a high inflationary environment against another classic asset hedge, gold – and arrive at some surprising conclusions.
